

Volume 59 | Issue 1

Article 17

2016

Packard and Hope's "Church Refugees: Sociologists Reveal Why People are DONE with Church but not their Faith" (Critical Review)

Craighton Hippenhammer
Olivet Nazarene University

The Christian Librarian is the official publication of the Association of Christian Librarians (ACL). To learn more about ACL and its products and services please visit <http://www.acl.org/>

Follow this and additional works at: <http://digitalcommons.georgefox.edu/tcl>

 Part of the Christianity Commons

Recommended Citation

Hippenhammer, Craighton (2016) "Packard and Hope's "Church Refugees: Sociologists Reveal Why People are DONE with Church but not their Faith" (Critical Review)," The Christian Librarian: Vol. 59 : Iss. 1 , Article 17.
Available at: <http://digitalcommons.georgefox.edu/tcl/vol59/iss1/17>

This Critical Book Review is brought to you for free and open access by Digital Commons @ George Fox University. It has been accepted for inclusion in The Christian Librarian by an authorized editor of Digital Commons @ George Fox University. For more information, please contact arolf@georgefox.edu.

Critical Reviews

Church Refugees: Sociologists Reveal Why People are DONE with Church but not their Faith,

By Josh Packard and Ashleigh Hope. Loveland, CO: Group Publishing, 2015.
143 pp. $14.99. ISBN 9781470725921

Reviewed by Craighton Hippenhammer, Associate Professor, Digital Initiatives Department, Benner Library & Resource Center, Olivet Nazarene University, Bourbonnais, IL

Attendance at Christian churches throughout the Western world has been declining dramatically, first in the mainline denominations and more recently in evangelical churches, too. Since 1977, the Gallup organization has been asking Americans to rate the honesty and ethical standards of people's professions. "In 2013 the clergy received its lowest score ever. The number of people who believe clergy has very high or high levels of honesty and ethical standards fell below 50 percent for the first time" (p. 17), a rating that has been falling ever since 1985 when a high of 67 percent was recorded. In fact, being a pastor now means that people are inclined to distrust them. One pastor quoted here said, "As a pastor and staff, we approach every day with the understanding that we need to focus on earning that trust back. It can never be assumed" (p. 17).

Christian leaders are concerned. Recent titles like unChristian (Kinnaman and Lyons), Why Nobody Wants to Go to Church Anymore (Schultz and Schultz), Generation ExChristian (Dyck), American Religion: Contemporary Trends (Chaves), and most recently, Churchless (Barna and Kinnaman) in 2014, which says that the unchurched represents one-third of the population, a portion being mature Christians who are choosing to leave church, testify to this concern. These "dechurched" are not angry or mad; they are just uninterested. Their leaving "simply reflects the firsthand experiences that led them to conclude churches are ill-equipped to support the flourishing life they hope for" (p. 20). As Barna and Kinnaman say, "we must admit the possibility that our churches are somehow enabling many people to stall out on their journey toward deep, transformative faith" (p. 20).

This book, Church Refugees, looks more in depth at this category it calls the "dechurched." In general, they are highly educated, church doers who have held leadership positions in an average of four churches, leading at all levels. So the dechurched may "not only contribute to the decline in religious affiliation and in worship attendance, but they may also be driving forces behind these trends” (p. 21). When they eventually leave, they speak of doing it for their spiritual survival and to flee the spiritual abuse. They do not give up on God. They simply give up on the institutional church.

This qualitative sociological study interviewed in depth nearly 100 people who had “made an active, deliberate decision to leave the institutional church” (p. 28); the authors came to call them the “dechurched” and/or the “Dones.” Although all their stories are unique, four common themes why they left showed through – reasons the authors did not expect.

First, the most important thing that people want in a church is a community who are experiencing God together and the Dones are no different. In fact, “a sense of community is so important that it will keep people in churches that they don’t otherwise care for” (p. 31). This is the main reason why people will stick with a church they hate because shopping for a whole new community is so difficult. The Dones repeatedly said they desired a church “where people are loved collectively rather than judged individually” (p. 32). While judgment will drive them away, if they ever had a true, trusting community, they will long to get that back. But judgment is the killer. And churches so often want “everyone to sign on to a common belief system before they can begin to do life with each other. This is not only a dubious way to practice Christianity according to [the Dones], but also a profoundly ineffective way to build community” (p. 40).

And it does not help when church leaders make lifestyle judgments without owning up to their own inadequacies. The dechurched view this as “intellectually and morally dishonest, inauthentic, and an overreach of power.... Hypocrisy.”

Secondly, the bureaucracy of the church gets in the way of growing in Christ when too much church activity is aimed at just keeping the place going. The Dones often leave when they understand that the structure of the church is getting in the way of their serving and growing in God. They want to be involved in meaningful activity, particularly in relationship formation, not internally focused housework of keeping organizational structures functioning. Many churches run on a top-down, controlling leadership style which stifles creativity and the desire of members to help shape its direction. They want to be more than just entry-level employees working for a large machine. “Top-down hierarchy of worship- and ministry-planning not only alienated these committed volunteers and staff from doing church work, but it also alienated them spiritually” (p. 61). So when the Dones leave church, they tend to construct alternatives through civic engagement, small groups and others sorts of spiritually more meaningful gatherings. That is missing in most Sunday morning worship services, which they believe are just a resource hog. “Nobody, not one single respondent, mentioned replacing church with a worship service or with a sermon series or with committee work. They are replacing church with meaningful activity that engages their communities and builds relationship, things they find missing in the church” (p. 76).

Thirdly, the Dones are concerned with the type of conversation that goes on at church. Church talk is usually argumentative, where two people state their positions without any intention of being influenced by the other, or dictatorial, where one person does all the talking and the other all the listening. The Dones hate this. They highly prefer authentic conversation where both parties are open to being influenced by the other. And shadow missions are abhorrent to them. Church planters and other religious missional groups who use a “relationship first” model where they pursue conversation with ulterior motives like getting them to come to church is seen as dishonest.

“Our respondents told us that the underlying message is that the person being invited to church or God is somehow less than the person extending the invitation. They said the tacit message is that there’s something fundamentally wrong, broken, or, at best, not fully realized, about that person’s life that can only be fixed by coming to church and being like the person doing the inviting. Our respondents viewed this as inherently judgmental and counterproductive to relationships they wanted to be built on mutual respect and authentic conversation” (p. 83).

So doctrine, a prepackaged set of beliefs, can actually hinder gaining an understanding of God, instead of helping. Just as university professors are coming to realize that being the sage on the stage has become less effective than being their students’ guide at their side, so also pastors need to see their role less as one conveying wisdom and knowledge to one who develops and facilitates understanding.

What Packard and Hope are relaying here in describing the reasons why extremely active and knowledgeable Christians are leaving the church is not another example of the growing religious individualism previously described by Robert Bellah’s Habits of the Heart’s personal syncretic religion, or Christian Smith’s Soul Searching’s moralistic therapeutic deism. While this group is more interested in the group over the individual, “they bristle at the notion that unity means uniformity” (p. 93). For the church to be able to reengage these folks, it will have to “adopt policies and practices that disseminate power, reduce the role of the pastor as the holder and conveyor of all knowledge, and utilize organizational resources to empower people rather than to control them” (p. 94).

Lastly, the Dones find that there is an extremely strong disconnect between the moral teachings of the church and actually engaging the world meaningfully. The is seen as wanting to police behavior to the exclusion of dealing with endemic economic issues, an orientation which comes across as an expression of power, control and authority. Church leaders are not seen as having their congregants' best interests at heart. To the Dones, "preaching a message about the evils of drinking seem[s] like so much small change compared to big-ticket items such as poverty, racism, and gender inequality" (p. 100). In fact, "there was a broad feeling among the surveyees of this study that the teachings of the church actually resulted in very little impact on lives around them – just doing lifestyle indoctrination and very little soul transformation" (p. 104). It's not that they were "done with church because they disagreed with the church's theology or because they disliked the people. These are the reasons people switch churches. People opt out of organized religion altogether because they think the structure is fundamentally flawed" (p. 104).

So this movement of mature Christians leaving the institutional church has nothing to do with theological orientation. What they deeply desire is to be able to share Christ's transformational message in meaningful ways, but the current Christian church structure and judgmental attitudes simply get in the way.

Chapter 6 makes four practical suggestions for implementing corrective action that churches can do to help the dechurched to reengage. First, invite participation, with limits, to encourage people to start meaningful ministries that are on their hearts. Trust your community. Second, undermine bureaucracy by putting timelines on some positions and committees so they dissolve when the timeline ends no matter what. Third, be truly relational by devoting "staff time and resources to knowing and supporting people rather than creating and maintaining programs. Do things with congregants rather than for congregants" (p. 114). And fourth, impact your community and be impacted at the grassroots level. Enable your community by helping them do things rather than doing things for them. "Instead, allow the celebrations and struggles of your local community to change and shape your congregation" (p. 114). Is there any other organization beyond the church that puts so much time and energy into training their people while doing so little to retain them? It just makes sense that those within your midst who are your most creative, involved and emotionally invested be encouraged in multiple ways to be highly engaged and fulfilled.

While this book is based on a sociological study, it is not an academic work and therefore contains no structured data and no index. It is an effort to translate the research findings into a practical book for students, lay folk and church leaders. It draws attention to an overlooked and extremely important segment of church members who are leaving in droves. The project was undertaken by the authors between 2012 and 2014 at the University of Northern Colorado. Although few of the survey respondents were bitter or angry at the church, the conversations were not easy to undertake. These people are alone. One of the last people interviewed for this project told the authors, "Thank you for listening to my story. Nobody has ever cared before. At least, nobody in the church has ever cared" (p. 140).

This book is ground breaking and should be in every Christian university, Bible school and seminary in the world and as a textbook in classrooms. How we do church now is so very, very flawed. Some of the best and brightest and most active are leaving because the church is getting in the way of their spiritual development and the sharing of their faith that they so desperately want to do. May God help us to understand the dynamics described in this book so we can rescue the church and reorient our members towards the salvation of our neighbors, as Jesus taught.

Hermeneutics of Hymnody: A Comprehensive and Integrated Approach to Understanding Hymns, by Scotty Gray. Macon, GA: Smyth & Helwys Publishing, 2015.

409 pp. $22.40. ISBN 9781573127677

Reviewed by Jason Runnels, Assistant Music Librarian, Southwestern Baptist Theological Seminary, Fort Worth, TX

Thousands of books have been devoted to various aspects of ministry ranging from pastoral ministry to business administration. More recently there have been upsurges in the number of books published that deal with worship and whether Christians know how to do this most basic of spiritual tasks. However, books on the study of hymns, hymnology, are less often seen. Part of the reason is that there are some that have become standards in the various colleges and universities and with good reason. Yet, there has been something missing in the literature that guides musicians in the process of selecting and utilizing hymns. Scotty Gray has given such a book to academia.

Hermeneutics of Hymnody identifies a gap in the skill among church musicians when it comes to demonstrating a knowledge of how to successfully use hymns in worship. The statement is very true and has resulted in poor choices for worship on more than one occasion. He states his primary goal is “to present foundations for a sound, comprehensive, and integrated understanding of hymnody and more objective criteria for evaluating hymns and tunes of whatever style” (p. xxi). Students have been taught the history of hymnody and some basic evaluation techniques in classes that were intended to do so but a close detailed examination is typically lacking.

The uniqueness of Gray’s approach is to take principles that are normally applied to evaluating Scripture, and using it on the various elements of a hymn. The idea, if hymnody is the voice of the church then the church should be just as careful in its use of these items as it is in its use of the Bible. To achieve this goal, Gray separates the book into nine chapters which allows a concentration on the different parts of